

Marte Wulff: The face of nature

- A musical talk on human creativity and the climate crisis.

Art is an expression of human nature. It can, like nature, connect us to something collective and bigger than ourselves, and awaken the commitment and sense of community we need in challenging times. Through artistic tools for presence, listening, curiosity and imagination, we can meet the challenges of our time and grow with them.

In this talk, Marte Wulff builds a bridge between science, politics and emotion when she - through her own words and music, tells personal and universal stories about how our creativity has brought us to where we are today - for better or for worse - and where it can take us next.

The talk is scalable from a short mini-concert up to a full hour talk, and will be personalized for your specific field and arrangement.

For booking or information, please contact marte@martewulff.com or ask HERE

Bio: Marte Wulff is an acclaimed, two time Spellemann/(Norwegian Grammy)-nominated artist, singer and writer with seven solo albums behind her. Since 2017 she has engaged in climate and environmental issues both through her music and talks, and as a social debater and activist. She has a certification in Creative Climate Leadership from Julie's Bicycles CCL programme, and was in 2020 named one of ten Green Guardians in the category of artists and activists in British music magazine IQ. Marte will be releasing her first novel on Oktober forlag in 2024, and is also one of two initiators behind Spillerommet, an artist movement working for an innovative and self-sustainable music industry